Editorial policy

From CryptoLicenseWiki, the free encyclopedia of crypto licenses · Last updated 28 November 2026

CryptoLicenseWiki is an independent reference. Crypto licensing is a field full of marketing claims, so this policy is stricter than usual. It explains where our facts come from, how we keep them current, and how we keep commercial interests out of the articles.

Sources

- Official sources first. Capital, fees, timelines and client protection rules come from the regulator, the law or another public body wherever one is available. These references are marked Official.
- Named secondary sources only where needed. If we cannot find a figure published officially, we use a named secondary source, say so in the text and mark the figure as “reported”.
- We say what we could not confirm. “Not confirmed” means exactly that; it does not mean the rule does not exist.
- Where sources conflict, the official source wins and the article notes the conflict.

Neutrality

- No regulator “tiers”. We compare what the rules require, row by row, so readers can weigh them.
- No exchange rankings, reviews or affiliate links. Articles never recommend an exchange or a token.
- No exchange or token advertising on license guides or comparison pages.
- We describe offshore and onshore regimes in the same format and the same tone.

Conflicts of interest

The operator offers paid private consultations on licensing. Consultation services are never mentioned inside license guides, and no jurisdiction is described more favourably because of client demand.

Dates and updates

- Every article shows a Last updated date and an “as of” date for its facts.
- License guides are reviewed at least twice a year, and promptly when a regulator changes its rules.

Corrections

Anyone can use Suggest an edit. Corrections must cite a source, preferably the regulator's own website. Editors check every suggestion against its source before changing an article.

Not advice

Articles are general information, not legal, financial or investment advice. See the disclaimer.
